

Workshop for EFLU Students on Publishing in International Journals
Prof. Srikant Sarangi, Aalborg University, Denmark

18 – 20 February 2019

Outline of the Workshop for Students

This workshop aims to explore the ways in which ongoing research can be translated into publications in high ranking international journals within and across disciplines. In addition to the anatomy of journal article, the key milestones of the publishing process are delineated – the pre-submission phase, the peer review and revision phases, and the editorial intervention/decision phase. Drawing on his long-standing experience as editor of three interdisciplinary, international journals, the workshop leader will use illustrative case studies to outline some of the major reasons which underline the negative and positive outcomes concerning submitted manuscripts. Particular attention will be paid to language-specific, genre-specific and discipline-specific practices, and the extent to which different journals (editors and reviewers) tend to attribute differential significance to such practices during the publishing process, although this may not become transparent to authors/researchers. The unique challenges faced by novice and non-native researchers will be addressed.

The workshop is particularly relevant for doctoral and postdoctoral researchers who have either had some experience in publishing or are intending to publish internationally. Access will be made possible to authentic, anonymised materials (original and revised manuscripts, reviewer reports, author-editor-reviewer correspondences). Workshop participants are encouraged to reflect on their publishing experience and disseminate their ongoing research ideas.

Please note that this workshop is not about academic writing skills. Participants will be required to undertake some pre-workshop and evening tasks.
